Leadership Summit

The Leader's Role in the Instructional Process

Instructional leadership is significantly effective when it comes to promoting increased levels of student achievement. Dozens of characteristics have been identified from research studies on school improvement and instructional leadership, including high expectations of students and teachers, participating in teacher learning, quality professional development, and the use of data to evaluate teacher impact and student results.

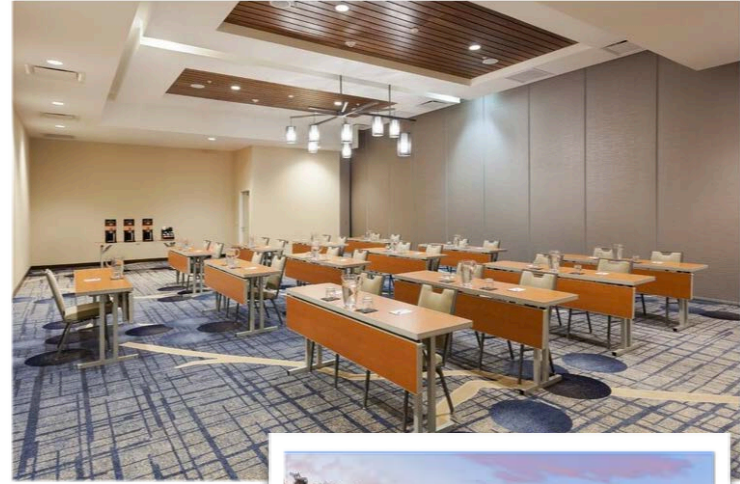

In this highly interactive and engaging session, participants will examine the most contemporary research available about specific leadership behaviors that have the greatest influence on student achievement. Learning how to promote and participate in teacher learning and development can help to form relationships that positively affect both students and teachers.

Session Outcomes

- Retooling your collaborative leadership profile through collective efficacy and Achievement Teams
- Create an effective leadership and instructional coaching profile
- Create an effective teacher profile
- Create a "Culture of Evidence" Toolkit by providing teachers with explicit tools in the areas of formative assessment, clarity, feedback, and implementing highly effective instructional strategies
