

Aime Black, Ed.D.

Dr. Aime Black is a consulting associate at Advanced Collaborative Solutions. Aime recently served as Education and Youth Engagement Advisor to the Ambassador and President of the United States at the U.S. Embassy Wellington, New Zealand. Prior, Aime was a senior education consultant and provider of technical assistance for the U.S. Department of Education, Institute of Education Sciences, Regional Educational Laboratory for the Pacific region.

Aime is a former middle school science teacher, curriculum specialist, data expert, and provider of professional development for pre- and in-service educators.

Aime is a true hybrid with expert knowledge in both education research and practice.

She designs, manages, and conducts education research and evaluation studies for enhancement of education policy and program design in the areas of culturally responsive practice, family and community engagement, data use, STEM education, and teacher and leadership development. Aime also leads and conducts technical assistance activities where she assists state, local, district, and school educators with data analysis, data-informed decision-making, reporting, and program monitoring and evaluation.

In addition to conducting research and developing and providing professional development, Aime is highly poised at establishing and maintaining relationships and partnerships to support collaborations among multiple stakeholders across the continental U.S. and throughout the U.S.-affiliated Pacific nations.

Aime received her doctorate in education from the University of Southern California in 2012, where she earned the University of Southern California Dissertation of the Year Award. Her bachelor's degree is in Political Science and her master's degree is in K-12 Education with an emphasis on Science Education and Cross-Cultural Language and Academic Development.

Although most of her life has been spent in Southern California, Aime and her husband (USMC LtCol John Black) have also recently enjoyed life in Hawaii, New Zealand, and Japan. Aime enjoys reading, running, hiking, practicing yoga, eating yummy food, and spending time with her family.
